In the transportation industry, may it be via road, rail, water or air ways, many threats and risks endanger the health and safety of workers and employees on a daily basis. In addition to health risks due to, e.g., noise, hazardous substances and musculoskeletal strain, factors such as stress, fatigue and violence as well as the participation in the traffic itself have a major impact on the health and safety of employees.

Main objectives of the Section on Prevention in Transportation:

- Establishing sustainable international minimum standards in order to reduce the number and severity of work- and commute-related accidents and to protect the health of employees, while, at the same time, taking the particular social and political situations into account.
- Fostering a culture of prevention and social security standards around the globe by implementing research results as well as knowledge management and transfer on occupational health and safety best practices among stakeholders, social partners, decision-makers in institutions and representatives of businesses, in politics and science in all sectors of the transport industry.
- Promoting and developing appropriate and innovative training and qualification programmes in occupational health and safety for employees in all areas of transportation and logistics.

Whatever the problem,
there is a solution
somewhere in the world!

The International Social Security Association (ISSA) is an international non profit organisation. Founded in 1927, the ISSA brings together more than 340 social security institutions from 150 countries around the world.

One main objective of the ISSA is to improve occupational safety and health as one essential constituent of social security. The Special Commission on Prevention of the ISSA and its sections dedicate their work to this aim. To develop tailored strategies, 13 Prevention sections are organised according to industrial branches and focal areas.

The International Section on Prevention in Transportation was founded in August 2014 and has its General Secretariat in Hamburg, Germany. For the transport sectors worldwide, our section aims at:

- protecting the health of employees,
- preventing work-related diseases and accidents,
- reducing the number and severity of accidents,
- fostering a culture of prevention,
- engaging authorities setting benchmarks in social security and
- improving the working conditions by exchanging best practice solutions.

One particularity of the Prevention sections in general and our section in particular is the diversity of its members representing social security institutions, organisations and companies.

Membership benefits include:

- Participation in working groups focusing on the various issues in transportation
- Reduced fees for participation in section activities, symposia and seminars
- Access to international conferences and seminars related to transportation
- Up-to-date information on current issues in occupational safety and health in transportation
- Opportunity to publish online on topics relevant to prevention in transportation
- Access to publications and online material

If you want to join us, support our activities and shape the culture of prevention and the social security standards in transportation and logistics internationally, become a member of the section by completing the attached membership application form.
